GREENING THE GOBI

In the Mongolian province of Omnogovi, a unique initiative known as the 'Gobi Greenwall' project is fighting desertification. It is different from ordinary reforestation efforts because it relies on the direct involvement of local nomad herders. Instead of paying with cash, herders who care for newly planted tree saplings receive food and water, often including traditional Mongolian flatbreads and airag. This simple idea has attracted significant international attention. It helps stabilize the encroaching sand dunes and provides a resource for local communities.

The system is easy to understand. When a herder agrees to manage and protect a specified area of one thousand saplings for a month, they receive a fixed, diverse ration of staple foods, they receive a fixed, diverse ration of staple foods, including rice, dried dairy products, and vegetable stews. If they manage a smaller area, their ration is adjusted accordingly. The saplings that are brought to the desert are grown in advanced, water-efficient nurseries. Workers are on permanent consentation. Workers prepare the soil and supply the herders with these saplings. Some of the most mature trees from the initial phase are now used to construct shelterbelts for gardens and livestock.
